

Mission Statement

Public transportation is quickly becoming one of the most sustainable options for travel, yet unequal distribution of infrastructure raises important questions of equity. Following a significant population increase over the last decade, Halifax, Nova Scotia has experienced increasing pressure on its transportation system. The current Halifax transit service serves over 17 million passengers annually, yet many communities may still lack adequate access. This project aims to examine Halifax population density and to identify communities that might have limited access to bus routes, aiming to address transit equity gaps that exist within the region.
